

Sustainable luxury ?

Nothing sings of contained thrills, like a Gucci buckle, with the double G. With owning luxury goods comes along, a sinister charm. But in the last couple of years, Premium fashion has been stripped of its integrity after the uncovering of several immoral practices, including burning tonnes of dead stock to preserve their brand image, which is largely based on product scarcity.

In an attempt to save face, most luxury brands are now hastily subscribing to sustainable practices. Usually, in times of such crisis, conventional practices resurface to breathe some reliability into superficial reforms, that don't pack any impact behind the hype. Second hand luxury is one such OG. Simple approach, maximum impact. Although thrifting had begun booming its market a decade before, to see the premium segment finally sustain a boom, teases us with hope, yet again.

The heavily popular trend of Vintage fashion, is very similar to it but not entirely the same. More often than not vintage fashion is branded severely on rare finds or antiques. But of course, it also stains character and maybe even an untold story to its fashion. Second hand luxury delivers a more holistic range, with its central motivation to check accumulation.

Either way, Two-way consigning is an experience no one should dare rid themselves of, because sustainability is not a choice anymore. Here are some underdog favourites we vouch for-

<https://www.audreyleightonvintage.com>

<https://www.vrttpvintage.com>