Motherland

In the last couple of years, India's cultures have interacted beyond cosplay, fetching national reach to localised cultures. Our Indie zine market is long overdue to surf these big waves, making it an absolute high to exploit this rich shift in the magazine scene.

Most indie magazines in India were started as passion projects by people who've tapped into the thrills of self-expression through cultural exploration. This makes them attentive to subcultures and effortlessly flesh out cross-cultural dynamics. All this nuance and OG narrative makes these zines Vibe gold.

Traffic in rain, crickets on summer nights, metro announcements on the way home, the economy crumbling under capitalism, ice caps melting away- everything just becomes background noise when you open a magazine. Dive into these indie zines we've picked out for you, that have slyly trapped an entire miniverse in them.

Concorde

Concorde, a photo-zine, is the brainchild of long-time photographer Kishor Krishnamoorthi. He believes that viewing photographs in print is a fine intimacy that creates a lasting impact. It tells the stories of all those things you notice, but don't pay attention to. From their older issue on abandoned cars to their latest on- no parking signs, they've humanized culture through their art. Don't wait too long to feast on this visual treat.

Cocoa and Jasmine

No one understands the value of cultural documentation like they do. This zine is built around underdog narratives. The founder, Sayali curated this platform to stage India's traditions on a global platform and promote cross cultural exchanges. It voices contemporary art and design from hyperlocal habitats- through interviews, photo essays, journals, design guides and artist features.

Mixtape

Going by its name, this zine is a skillfully curated anthology of comics by various artists across the country. Naturally, it delivers diversity in the themes, narratives and sketches of the comics breaking monotony at so many levels. Fuelled with their undying love for print and the bliss of collaborative art, Studio Kokaachi started Mixtape. They also do matchbox comics, for the ones with short attention spans and zero calorie comics for instant downloads. Mixtape's latest volume on love and lobsters takes us to momo cafes, ilayaraja songs, twilight zones and silver spiders all at once.

Storycity

Storycity is the pet project of a Mumbai based design studio Kahani. Smitten by the first city of East, they set out to explore its course of development. They curate guides with illustrated maps and souvenir postcards that narrate the evolution of Mumbai through bollywood buildings, old-world facades, its relationship with the sea, museum floors and all other details that hide in plain sight. Maybe that's why their guides appeal to travellers and locals alike. It's almost nasty that the most hyped city still delivers beyond the typecasts. Feel the ground beneath your feet shift across timelines, as Storycity throws light on what this city has been telling all along.

Helter Skelter

The good old helter skelter is the torch bearer of our indie zine culture. Started in 2010, it's managed to consistently engage its loyal audience. From films, books, theatre, food, music, art, and travel to personal essays, social commentary, human interest pieces, interviews, features, reviews, photography- it talks about everything under the sun. Give this timeless classic a spin for old time's sake.

Motherland

The billy Joel of magazines, this one concocts cocktails of subcultures, that stay with us long after the last page. Don't take our word for it, explore their issue themed on 2045! Global race to the moon, babies in external wombs, flowers in space and of course the time machine – they have covered it all.

Motherland is big on- less talk, more communication. It bothers to be brave if that's the cost to be real. It doesn't market revolution, it silently pulls you in. Though we've just described a cult, we assure you it's only a bi-monthly magazine.

The team behind motherland, helped build India's most successful global brands, including Royal Enfield, Incredible India and Make in India. Besides being Name-droppable, and jamming to the pulse of our nation through the years, they are still topping the reinvention game, delivering content fresh as hell.

Soup Magazine

Get back home quickly on a friday night. Whine about how you're perpetually bored on the weekends. Stumble upon Soup, a magazine that speaks to your demographic - the young adults stuck in a world going through all major transitions in timelapse. Feel special that this platform isn't trying to trap you in between polarised news and summer essential sales. Read through their top pieces. Experience the warmth in realising that no matter what we go through, there's always evidence of someone who's already been through it. Sleep on it. Text your friend- Maybe humans are beta glitches in nature's social experiment

All these independent print magazines can be bought through Paper Planes, a thoughtfully curated online shop, offering a large selection of international and Indian independent magazines and books.

You never knew you needed an entire magazine with pictures of abandoned cars for your sunday binge or an old-school map to explore Mumbai. Suddenly, it's all you can think about.
